From A Window on Grant—November 2021

Back in July I stumbled on an article by Michele Margolis who is the author of From Politics to the Pews: How Partisanship and the Political Environment Shape Religious Identity. The second paragraph took my breath away; here's what it says: "It's not just that our religious beliefs affect our politics – it's that our politics affect our religious choices. We don't just take cues about politics from our pastors and priests; we take cues about religion from our politicians."

It's not just job security that I'm worried about when I read this. I'm worried about people in general when they take religious marching orders from politicians. Of course, there are devout politicians. I think of people like Mitt Romney and Joe Biden, two politicians well-known for being religiously devout. What I know, and what I know you know, is that politicians too often use religion as a tool to sort of trick demographics of voters for one of two reasons: to get elected or reelected. As Ms. Margolis writes, "consider that as recently as the 1970s, white Republicans were no more religious than white Democrats. Today they are nearly 20 percent more likely to go to church regularly and likewise about 20 percent more likely to believe in God." This is a problem.

For starters, it perpetuates the ongoing fracturing in American society. In other words, people who believe a certain way about politics are sorting themselves into the same churches. When this happens, as the article notes, it creates echo chambers. This is an inherently anti-religious situation because religion isn't about being a Democrat or a Republican.

One of the roles the church plays in society is that of a tolerance promoter. We don't play to a certain crowd. We don't perpetuate the self-sorting that's happening throughout the nation. We resist this by promoting concepts like patience, understanding, curiosity, and reverence for human life. The church is a house for saints and sinners. I think it was Martin Luther who said we're "all simultaneously saint and sinner." Nobody's perfect. Because of that the church doesn't ask for perfection, not in action or thought. It asks for faith.

I'm not saying being religious is anti-political. Sometimes one of the most religious things you can do is take political action. What I'm saying is that we're a church. Period. We're here to grow our souls, to be open to a diversity of ideas, to collectively orient our attention to that which is greater than us: hope and peace and grace and forgiveness. And if St. Paul is right that God is love, we're here to focus on love.

At the end of the article Ms. Margolis offers these startling words: "When politics affects whether and where Americans go to church, even our houses of worship become political echo chambers. Americans will increasingly find themselves able to bitterly denounce or unflinchingly laud [insert a politician's/political party's name], to a chorus of agreement. In the end, this will further divide us." The church used to swim against the currents of culture. Now it seems we're just floating down stream. If you want my advice, I'd say we wake up and start swimming.

See you at church,

Brian

Reflections

With the winter holidays fast approaching and November's Soul Matters theme of "Holding History," I've been thinking a lot about holidays past, and all the ways this year will need to be different (again!), and I want to share with you one of my happiest holiday memories.

It has been so long now that I don't remember whether it was Christmas or Thanksgiving, but for as long as I can remember, we split the holidays between my mom's and dad's sides of the family. As kids, we loved holidays with my mom's family. Two words - Dessert Table. My dad's family's holidays on the other hand were a bit of a train wreck. Don't get me wrong I love my dad's family, but my grandfather had 10 children, and 60+ grandchildren, great grandchildren, and great-great grandchildren. So, holidays there were always loud and hectic. My aunts were usually in charge of the meal, but maybe shouldn't have been.

That year in particular was no different. The meal was usually planned for mid-afternoon, but at 3:00pm, the meal wasn't ready. Not unusual. And at 4:00, the meal was not ready. Again, not unusual. Finally, at 5:00 pm when the turkey was still not ready, someone realized the oven had not been turned on. So, it was at this point my parents decided to cut their losses, and head out with their three hungry tweenagers to see what they could find.

This was back when everything closed for the holidays. So, we didn't have any restaurants to pick from, no grocery stores to stop at, and most gas stations were closed. But just as my siblings' and my grumbling and complaining from the back seat was getting intolerable, we came across a truck stop that was open and serving food. It was a holiday miracle!

Once inside, we quickly found ourselves a table, opened the menus, only to have our stomachs drop again. There was no turkey; there was no tofurkey; no mashed potatoes and gravy; no cranberry sauce; no brussels sprouts; no pumpkin pie; no green bean casserole; no butternut squash; no apple pie ala mode, and not even a Grinchy roast beast or can of who hash. I'm not quite sure what my siblings and I expected from a truck stop. However, we were starving, nonetheless. So, we begrudgingly ordered, and set about our plan to pout the rest of the meal.

Now, honestly, I couldn't actually tell you what we had to eat that night or what we exactly we talked about, but I do remember a lot of memories shared at that table. Maybe we talked about when Pepper, my grandfather, cooked the meal you could find him in the kitchen at 7:00 am peeling potatoes and blasting German Oompah Band music. Or how Meme, my grandmother, would put a can of vegetables into our stockings, and how we wished she had been there that year. Or maybe the time my brother and our cousin Pete decided to play ice football on the not quite frozen enough pond and fell knee deep into freezing water. Living up to their nickname Pete and Re-Pete, because if one found trouble the other was shortly behind. I do know there were some funny memories, some happy, some sad, some really embarrassing, and all were shared with lots of love.

I share this story with you, and as reminder to myself, that even when things don't go as planned, look like they usually do, or when we are grieving the losses of what could have been, there can still be joy, connection, and gratitude. No matter how it looks, I am grateful to be at UU Wausau for the holidays this year; to be finding joy and connection with our families, RE kids, and you all; and that someone forgot to turn on the oven the year of truck stop holiday.

From the Board Table—November 2021

Thoughts on the value of divergent perspectives:

I recently took a short trip with my brother. We met up in the Pacific Northwest and spent most of our time in the forest heading to and from waterfalls. He is a photographer and as such had our destinations in mind (along with the preferred times to be there for ideal lighting opportunities). Consequently, I got to experience twice as many breathtaking views in 2 days than I would have managed on my own.

While we were hiking to one of our last spots, he shared that since becoming serious about his photography hobby, he's found it hard to imagine how or why people would travel to beautiful places with nothing but a smart phone. He clarified his new perspective: without a good camera to capture the full extent of the beauty, those experiences are lost to memory. With his camera he is never bored because he always has a photo project to focus on. I shared with him that, despite not being a photographer, I can't remember a time when I was bored while surrounded by natural beauty. When left to my own devices in the woods, I can spend hours on a small stretch of trail, using all my senses to fully appreciate the world around me. "All of nature fills me with its grace...all of life is calling me...to be more whole", these lyrics, from a song the choir is performing, really resonate with me. As such, I haven't seen a quarter as much of the world as my brother, but what I've been able to see I've been lucky enough to really see. I shared this with him in response to his curiosity about us travelers without photo equipment.

He didn't say much and we split up, he to photograph a mountain at sunset, me to meander along a different part of the trail. I like to think we were each contemplating the other's perspective while we wandered with a different focus and different intentions.

I admit, though, this is something I had to consciously decide to do. My instinct is to notice all of the reasons that my way is best. After all, my way allows me to practice the mindfulness and presence I know is so vital to my own mental wellness, and that research suggests is beneficial to all. I know that deep, lasting memories, are possible only with full presence in the moment, otherwise we are too focused on the next thing to make a lasting impression of this one.

My immediate response was to consider my brother's outcome focus as short sighted. The big beauty will be captured, but what about all the little things along the way? I suspect the truth lies in between, his drive and focus propel him to seek out places I would never even know were there. He provides the destination, I provide opportunity to revel in the journey getting there.

My trip was 3 weeks ago. In a recent service, Greg Venne provided another opportunity to reflect that others' opposing perspectives are not only valid, but instructional and, dare I say, vital. We open up to growth and true connection when we are able to let go of being right and welcome exploration of the unknown view. While traveling with my brother, I had many opportunities for new sights: both metaphorically and literally.

Opening up to each other's worldviews in this way may be the beginning of healing lifelong challenges between us. Finding our way to recognizing value in our vastly different approaches seems like a good start. Certainly, it demonstrates that having purpose effects where you wander in the world, and having mindfulness informs how you wander and what you see, and they both matter.

Community Focus Collection—November 2021

Wisconsin Judicare is a non-profit law firm whose mission is to create equal access to justice by providing legal assistance to those who otherwise cannot afford it. It is the civil legal service provider for Wisconsin's northern 33 counties and 11 federally recognized Indian tribes. From the beginning, Wisconsin Judicare recognized a special commitment to serving Wisconsin Indians and Indian tribes. Wisconsin Judicare has played an active role in many major Wisconsin cases concerning tribal sovereignty and treaty rights issues in the last 30 years. They provide legal assistance for cases involving family law, bankruptcy, housing, income maintenance, social security and SSI, health, and wills. Their vision is equal justice for all.

This month's CFC will be on Sunday, November 21st. If you're able to be present you'll hear a short presentation about the agency and be able to show your support during the collection. If you're not in church on that Sunday you can still show your support by sending your check to UU Wausau, marked for the specific organization in the memo line.

Our October CFC raised over $1000 for New Beginnings. Thank you for your generosity!

Fair Elections

"UU the Vote" did not stop with its successful efforts of 2020; neither did the Social Justice Committee. Don Dunphy has been our guy on the front lines for fair maps and against voter suppression. Don believes that NOW is the best time to make your voice heard in support of fair maps. You can sign a petition at the Wisconsin Fair Maps Coalition's website and demand the Wisconsin state legislature pass nonpartisan redistricting legislation at: <https://www.fairmapswi.com/petition21> . You can learn more (and donate) at: <https://www.fairmapswi.com/> ... or become involved at "UU the Vote," where Wisconsin remains one of ten "focus" states (<https://www.uuthevote.org/get-involved/>).

You can write your state representatives to help end Wisconsin's extreme* gerrymandering. The Seven Principles of UU Congregations

Unitarian Universalist congregations affirm and promote seven Principles, which we hold as strong values and moral guides. We live out these Principles within a “living tradition” of wisdom and spirituality, drawn from sources as diverse as science, poetry, scripture, and personal experience.

As Rev. Barbara Wells ten Hove explains, “The Principles are not dogma or doctrine, but rather a guide for those of us who choose to join and participate in Unitarian Universalist religious communities.”

1st Principle: The inherent worth and dignity of every person;

2nd Principle: Justice, equity and compassion in human relations;

3rd Principle: Acceptance of one another and encouragement to spiritual growth in our congregations;

4th Principle: A free and responsible search for truth and meaning;

5th Principle: The right of conscience and the use of the democratic process within our congregations and in society at large;

6th Principle: The goal of world community with peace, liberty, and justice for all;

7th Principle: Respect for the interdependent web of all existence of which we are a part.
